STATE CAPITOL AT AUSTIN, TEXAS
Built of red granite from Mr. Caterson's quarry, Granite Mt., Texas

Introduction.

THIS exhibit of the monumental work of Robert Caterson embraces some of the more important of the Mausoleums, Vaults and Monuments, that he has produced in the past thirty-four years of his experience, partly showing its extent and general character, and an aid to those contemplating such work or other mortuary memorials in the varied suggestions presented. Although the greater portion will be found in Woodlawn Cemetery, New York City—adjoining which his office and establishment are located—it may be seen at various points widespread in the States, and some of it across the ocean.

The development of mortuary architecture, particularly that of mausoleums and vaults, has necessarily been closely followed in such a large and varied experience; so, whether the problem be one of a costly outlay or of limited means, this experience should assure the achievement of the desired result.

Monumental work, to most fitly serve its purpose, should first attain to the very highest excellence in design and durability of material. Granite, being mostly used for exterior exposures, is of such a varied character that a quality meeting all the requirements is found in few quarries in the country. These are chiefly in the New England States, and Mr. Caterson's connections with them is such as to secure the most perfect stock obtainable. His varied work, however, requires an unlimited field of production, and, whether from our home quarries or the well-known quarries of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, or his own extensive quarries at Granite Mountain, Texas, none are too remote to be reached, and from them has been gathered the varied material producing the Huntington, Coster, Ehret, Hobart and other Mausoleums, the State Capitol at Austin, Texas, and the sundry vaults and monuments herein shown, even including the jetties and sea-wall at Galveston.

Marble is also a monumental material in common use, and next to granite in demand. But, as the different quarries, native and foreign, produce such a variable quality in texture, hardness and durability, care and experience is required in its selection. It is impracticable to illustrate the interiors of the several mausoleums, some of which, in their marble decorations, carvings, mosaics, bronzes and stained glass, are productions of the most elaborate and artistic character.

It is thus seen that Mr. Caterson is prepared and qualified to execute any work entrusted to him, and will gladly exhibit designs and submit proposals for such as may be contemplated.
